

Risk management and governing change: the question of blame avoidance

Professor Christopher Hood, All Souls College Oxford and London School of Economics and Political Science

This paper will consider the growth of risk management in government and business and the various risk management regimes that have developed. It will pay particular attention to the different techniques for avoiding blame when things go wrong that have been developed by governments and other institutions